

Religious, Neighborhood, and Community Organizations

Communities are stronger when neighbors know each other and are able to respond to problems in the community in a proactive and effective manner. Religious, neighborhood, and community-based organizations provide residents opportunity for meaningful participation in community life.

Accurate data about the presence of such organizations is difficult to find. Data on informal organizations or groups that do not have a permanent locations (such as churches meeting in temporary facilities) is especially sparse. This report combined five separate data sources, in an attempt to locate established organizations. 492 “established” organizations were found countywide. These groups own improved property and/or are actively participate in county affairs.
